What is Counselling?

Counselling is a way of dealing with problems by talking them over with a counsellor. Your counsellor will listen to you and give you full attention. Sometimes, an understanding ear is all that is needed.

Other times, counsellors will teach you new skills, show you new ways of looking at things and help you find solutions. When I work with you, I want the best outcome for you and will work with you to achieve it.

Why should I come to Counselling?

Clients come to counselling for many reasons. You may have a problem you just can't quite cope with by yourself. It may be a vague feeling that something is not right and you want to talk it over with someone. Maybe you want to develop more self-awareness, understand your feelings, or try new things.

You may want to explore your world-view, take a new direction or get more satisfaction out of life. Or improve your relationships or self-confidence. Counselling will help you address these issues and more.

If you're feeling anxious or stressed, having a hard time or something unexpected happens, counselling may help you. If you've lost a loved one or a job, received bad news or there's a serious illness in the family, counselling will help you manage the change and deal with the stress.

Some clients want help with mental health or wellbeing problems. Counselling can help you manage and recover from many problems, including: abuse, addictions, anxiety, depression, grief, panic attacks, phobias, relationship problems and trauma.

Some people feel anxious all the time but don't know why. Coping with life-changes and milestones, such as children leaving home, menopause or a parent dying may bring you to counselling.

In fact, any problem relating to how you are feeling or thinking could be a reason to visit a counsellor. They will soon let you know if they can help you, and if not, point you to someone who can.
